

News

POURING THEIR ART OUT

By The Record

September 07, 2013

Artists and creative types turned out Friday at Victory Park for Art Break Day, joining thousands across the country and world in breaking the barriers of the art world down and making it more inclusive.

Founded by Bay Area-based artists Lauren Odell Usher Sharpton and Lisa Rasmussen and brought to Stockton by Joy Neas for the first time this year, Art Break Day aims to encourage people to stop and to create art all over the world on the same day.

Art Break Day has grown to 19 participating cities, 10 in California alone, as well as one in West Africa and one in India.

Tables and chairs were set up beneath a tent at Victory Park near The Haggin Museum all day Friday for those who wanted to take a crack at creating art.

Supplies were donated by Art is Moving, and Neas assembled portable art kits to give to the first 100 participants.